A Reversal
Of Position

By LOUISE B. CUMMINGS

There may be many ways by which a girl with a fortune may propose to the man she wants for a husband, he being poor and not in a position to propose to her. The American method of marriage is that the husband supports the wife. But few such expedients have been published. This is probably because the matter is a delicate one, concerning only the contracting parties.

George Parkinson was looking for some signal from Leticia Scarborough. He was a sensitive fellow and would make no advances himself whatever.

Miss Scarborough had a number of suitors, who, whether or no they possessed the wherewithal to warrant their asking her to marry them, were not backward in indicating their intention. George seldom went to see her without stumbling on a fresh arrival of flowers sent by some fellow as a preliminary to an offer of his hand. They made him bite his lip, for he very much wanted the young lady for himself, but was too proud even to indicate the fact in any formal or informal way. He held that if a woman with a future wanted a man with a way to let him know that a proposal from him will be accepted.

He has been on friendly terms with her—to apply no stronger word—for some months without her giving him the signal. During this time other stars had appeared in the matrimonial heavens, but had disappeared like those comets which, having once circled around the sun, go forth never to return. Out of the withered flowers they left George gathered hope. In one way at least his position was preferable to theirs—they had placed a gulf between themselves and the lady by proposing to her. George had done nothing of the kind. So long as he was not a rejected suitor he was free to continue his attentions ad libitum.

He noticed that they all went through much the same course. A man would meet Miss Scarborough at some function; would ask permission to call; would do so several times. Then an invitation to theater, concert or opera would follow; more calls; flowers. Then the scene would suddenly darken like a moving picture screen when the films have run out. The lady would remain; the man would take himself out of her world altogether.

George did not accuse Miss Scarborough of encouraging these men. He knew that she wished simply to be friendly with them, to avail herself of their attentions, for which, by the bye, she always gave some kind of return, and when she saw the usual signs of a coming declaration she strove to prevent it. What reason had he to suppose, if he could bring himself, as he expressed it, to ask her to share her fortune with him, that he, too, would not cease to revolve about the central sun and go out into space?

It is a common thing for women to bring men to a declaration by some artifice, but there are few cases of a man scheming for a proposition from a woman. Indeed, such a condition is an anomaly. George determined to do that very thing. He did not put at something she had said to him; he did not look languishingly at her nor drop his eyes before her gaze. He told her that he was going to a far country to take up a new abode, never to return.

This was worse—far worse—than the otherfuges women resort to, because they usually mix up a quantum of truth in their statements, and in any event custom excuses them for saying one thing and meaning another. But George deliberately lied.

He was somewhat encouraged when he made the announcement of his intended departure to her to see her wince. But he remembered that no one likes to give up a friend, and such disinclination is no proof that a woman will marry a man to keep him from going to a foreign country. She asked the date of his departure, and George, who was a trifle impatient, said that it was fixed for one week from that day.

"You will surely come to see me before you go?" she asked.

"Certainly. But I shall be very busy for a few days before I depart. I will call to say farewell next Wednesday afternoon."

On the appointed day he called and was ushered into the library, where he found the lady sitting at a desk writing a letter. On his entrance she left the desk to welcome him. After chatting with him for awhile she left the room, saying she had a little parting gift for him which she would bring back with her. George, after her withdrawal, went to the desk for a pencil in order to write an address. Catching a glimpse of his name, he seemed unable to prevent a rapid glance at the note. It was to the writer's most intimate friend, saying:

Today is my parting with George Parkinson. Would that I were the man and he the woman that I might propose to him!

There wasn't much of it, but there was nothing indefinite in it. George would not have accepted a declaration of love without a proposal of marriage. Such would be an insult from a man to a woman, and why not from a woman—with a fortune—to a poor-man?

When the young lady returned he told her that he was broken hearted at leaving her and that if she would marry him he would not go.

THE WOMAN WAITS.

A changing light behind a half drawn curtain.

Through the blurred pane a woman's anxious face

That peers and peers, while fingers grope uncertain

Along the sill and up the filmy lace,

New live, now listless, as each footstep passes—

What untold strains that nervous hand relates!

So, in a whirl of hopes and fears and guesses,

The woman waits.
